

Why Our Work Matters

In my opinion, the OSS conversation is significant and meaningful. . . Well Done! – Shelley B.

I love this project! It fits so well with my own interests and passions - "the other side" - love it. I know all about relocations and the impact on self development, careers and identity. It is about making the invisible visible – Jody T.

I wanted to write to say how much I love your message of empowerment for military spouses. – Maria T.

I think you have really started something great and more than anything, started a really great conversation about professional military spouses. Just watching your video about the challenges, but also how much we love and support our military member, despite those challenges was refreshing. We are a strong, resourceful, creative bunch who figure out how to meet our professional goals and love our military member and the life at the same time. – Ryan D.

I wanted to tell you how wonderful I think it is that you are reaching out and starting this conversation. – Kelly M.

This is wonderful and much needed!! Leaving my career behind after marrying into the military has been a huge struggle for me. – Sophia P.

Spouses serve, and it's important to help people understand how to support spouses: whether that's civilian friends or legislators deciding how to allocate resources. I also believe that as military spouses speak honestly about the challenges we face, many spouses will breathe a sigh of relief as they realize they aren't alone. If it's not taboo to discuss, there's no shame in the roller coaster emotions. – Katye R.

It's a great cause and one that I've seen many of my friends go through the challenges. If this conversation can get people talking about it and bring change....or at least a professional network to rely upon within the community, it's worthwhile to assist! – Courtney P.

I had goosebumps listening to the included segments from your interview and I feel blessed to be a part of this! – Laura H.

I'm so excited to be a part of your community and reap the benefits of this much-needed organization. – Stephanie B.
